Is it ironic that you guys hate coercion of capitalism yet in the USSR, you had no choice but to work (for adult) or be jailed. Though I think the mandatory motivation for not getting in jail and having lots of paths in life to make a living would be an improvement over unemployment. I actually prefer that idea over the current system where I live in that respect.

The contradiction here is palpable though.

This is the most braindead conception of what marxists think you could have.

I do not hate having to contribute to society, I hate working my ass off for shit wages, for the benefit of some rich parasites, while I get effectively no democratic input, and my living conditions keep going down while technology keeps improving.

I hate capitalism precisely *because* I hate freeloading pieces of shit. In capitalism its the bourgoiesie, in the soviet union its lazy mfs, in my own life its all the people who come and go through my org who talk the big talk but dont put in the work.

There is litterally not a contradiction, you just think Marxists are the same as lifestylist anarchists in the "duuuuude work is like oppression maaaaaaan, abolish clocks and shit now!" way

The USSR was a regime of labor alienation and top-down management to achieve the accumulation of surplus value into state coffers, it was coercive because it was another regime of Capital, only it operated with state managers of a vast proletariat that weren't themselves technically capitalists, as they did not privately accumulate the wealth the Soviet proletariat produced, but were indeed the managerial operatives of the big state monopoly

It seems like OP's actual point was the transparent truth that the Soviet Union was hardly different from the West at the high watermark of the Postwar Boom, offering exactly the same managerial control, alienation from the process and product of labor, and immediate appropriation of one's products as already existed in the West anyway, only under the banner of socialism and lacking the creature comforts workers in the wealthier, imperialist West enjoyed. Essentially, MLs had nothing to offer any worker actually living in an already modern, industrialized country, and had little more to offer the masses of anywhere else much more than the vision of a socialist party that could complete for those places the tasks of the bourgeois revolutions and social democratic reformism

▶ Anonymous 🇺🇸 23-11-24 10:32:19 No.2044254

Being under siege changes how a society functions. There is a reason the maladaptive form of socialism that grew in the USSR can be referred to as Siege Socialism. To have a society invest heavily in the education of its people, and their healthcare, but receive nothing in return (their labor) can only be disastrous. A more apt criticism of Soviet work culture can be found in its unwillingness to eliminate vestigial work, leading to an overgrowth of bureaucrats who wanted to maintain their status in the middle strata. Often at the expense of streamlining and efficiency.

Lewald Berberov and Armand Hammer talk during a meeting / Vladimir Masluyev / 2008

Armand Hammer (1898 – 1990), the famous American businessman, was well acquainted with Soviet leaders from Lenin to Gorbachev, and despite the antagonism between the U.S. and the USSR he successfully conducted business with the socialist state for decades. It's still disputed whether Hammer was a peace dove or a cunning Soviet spy, but one thing is for certain: the man knew how to make money despite politics.

Pretty much unheard of in socialist countries. Nearly all of them achieved full employment, and the ones that didn't were usually very market-oriented (referring here to Yugoslavia).

You are framing your position from the most privileged liberal fucking stand point I can think of, so ridiculously privileged that I just have to assume you are an actual child who has never had to pay bills or work a day in their fucking life, and if you aren't a child you fucking sound like one.

Second, your assumption is that labor is required to obtain luxuries and not to sustain survival as it is for the vast majority of humanity, further cementing your position as utterly privileged and out of touch with the vast working population around the world.

If you find school coercive, run the fuck away form home and hop some trains. Come back to when you have experienced some actual poverty.

No such thing. People pay for schooling with taxes.

Also kids are forced to go to school or theyre thrown into juvie. Also, school is only easier than work if you like having your life over-regulated, eating cafetera slop that makes you fat and lazy and dealing with unnecessary teen drama.

Again people like you who think work is bad are often just disgruntled manchildren whom are still enslaved to their wounded inner child.
